

Finding a Therapist You Like A Guide for Youth and Young Adults

Step 1

Determine if you are in crisis.

You might be thinking, “gee, I should find someone to talk to about the things going on in my life and the stuff I struggle with.” If that’s the case, finding a therapist might be a good idea.

But if you’re feeling so alone, angry, sad, or upset that you might be a danger to yourself or someone else, you may be in crisis.

Crisis is not the time to find a therapist. Crisis is the time to seek immediate help. Find an adult you trust and tell them what’s going on.

What do all those letters mean?

Professionals go to school a long time to get some alphabet soup added to the end of their signature.

Here’s what some of it means:

PhD or PsyD : This usually indicates that the person is a psychologist. They’re experts on the mind and behavior. They can’t prescribe medicine, but they should be good at helping you understand why you perceive things the way you do.

MD : You probably recognize this one. This person is a medical doctor. If they specialize in psychology, they’re typically called a psychiatrist. They can prescribe medicine.

MSW or DSW : This is a social worker. A social worker provides social services in a health setting. They’re usually pretty empathetic, meaning they’ll try to understand how you’re feeling at any given time.

LPC or LMHC : Licensed Professional Counselor or Licensed Mental Health Counselor – This person will have at least a master’s degree in counseling and a certification from the state they work in. They sometimes work in hospitals or schools.

Step 2

Identify what you need.

Think about the particular situation you’re in. What’s contributing to your desire for a therapist – your relationships, stuff at school, certain behaviors you’ve picked up? Look for a therapist who specializes in what you’re dealing with. You might use a directory like the ones at:

UCompareHealthcare.com

ABCT.org

locator.APA.org

Remember to think about how far you’re willing to travel to see this person. Think about how frequently you’ll visit and how you’ll be getting there.

Step 3

Learn about treatment orientations.

Experience matters. Different mental health professionals have different ways of approaching the people they work with (that’s what we mean by treatment orientation). This means a lot for the way the therapist you choose will build a relationship with you. Some styles aren’t going to be comfortable for you, and that’s okay.

Step 4

Trust your gut.

You might do a bunch of research, find someone you think will be great, and then figure out that they’re totally lame when you meet them. If you feel uncomfortable with the therapist or feel like they don’t have time for you or don’t care, look for someone else.

Step 5

When you find the right person, be honest.

Don’t waste your time and money if you’re not going to take it seriously.

Finding a Therapist You Like A Guide for Youth and Young Adults

Myths and Misconceptions About Seeking Therapy

"Therapy is for crazy people."

Therapy is for people who realize they need some help. That's not crazy.

"Therapy is for whiners."

Therapy isn't easy. It's for people who are willing to take responsibility for themselves and take a long, hard look at what they could do better.

"Therapy is for people who aren't smart enough to figure out their own problems."

A therapist doesn't just tell you what to do. They encourage you to act on your own.

"Therapy is for girls."

There are no rules about who can or can't get help from a therapist, end of story.

"Going to therapy is a sign of weakness."

It's actually exactly the opposite – going to therapy takes guts. It can demand a lot from you, emotionally and otherwise.

"You can't go to therapy unless there's something really wrong with you."

There are all sorts of therapists who specialize in all sorts of stuff.

What you need a therapist for will be completely different than what someone else needs.

"If I go to therapy, everything will get fixed immediately."

It takes time to work through the junk life throws at us. Be willing to take as much of it as you need.

"Therapists just want to give me meds."

Some therapists can't even write prescriptions. Don't worry about being forced to accept medications.

Signs You Might Need a New Therapist

- :: You feel ridiculed or criticized.
- :: The therapist focuses on themselves instead of you.
- :: The therapist doesn't help you create goals.
- :: You're encouraged to blame your family or friends.
- :: You're frequently confused when you leave a meeting.
- :: The therapist makes decisions for you.
- :: The therapist isn't sensitive to your culture or religion.
- :: You're encouraged to spend social time with the therapist.
- :: You feel manipulated or overly vulnerable.
- :: The therapist seems overwhelmed by you.
- :: The therapist doesn't remember details of your life.
- :: The therapist doesn't give you enough time to talk.
- :: You aren't allowed to look at your own records.
- :: The therapist doesn't pay attention while you're speaking.