

Family/Youth Voice to

Data Process

1 Families have a voice

Families and youth are too often unheard while navigating through various systems, trying to access care for their kids. But they have something to say.

2 Data Collection

We hear these family and youth voices and collect them to strengthen that voice. Collection can be through surveys, databases, intake forms, or spreadsheets.

4 Create Findings

Once the family and/or youth voices are collected and analyzed, they need to be presented in a way that makes sense to the message. This could be through reports, infographics, narratives, or training curriculums.

3 Analyze Results

While we have a good open and active communication with our families and youth, in every data collection, there can be some surprises. We look at what the data is showing us, for better or worse.

5 Communicate Findings

Family and youth voices need to be distributed to people who need to hear them. This could be to legislation, communities, partners, or agencies. It is always back to the families who shared their voices and stories with us.

6 What Data Can Do

Data can create positive change! When a legislator hears the family voice in data, they can support laws that help families and family members. Families can hear other family voices and increase their own knowledge and skills. Change makers can create solutions to problems youth are facing.

7 Follow Up

We might see another issue, problem, or topic arise while in a previous step. We can follow up with families and youth, and make sure everything is representative of the original voice or start a new process for a new voice.
